Q: Logic: proving results in inductive proofs Prove by induction that if S is a subset of R^2 then $\exists x, y \in R: (x, y) \in S$. I know we can do this by: Base case with S having no elements: $(0, 0) \in S \rightarrow \exists x, y \in R: (x, y) \in S$.

Induction step with $n+1$: Induction hypothesis: $\exists x, y \in R: (x, y) \in S$ And suppose we have a proof as above. Would it be enough to say that if S has at least one element, then it has a tuple that satisfies our induction hypothesis? A: No. In general, a theorem that follows from an inductive hypothesis does not follow from the inductive hypothesis itself. Consider the theorem: If S is a subset of R , then $\bigcap S$ is a subset of R . It's easy to prove that this theorem follows from the inductive hypothesis: The inductive hypothesis implies that if $\bigcap S = \bigcap T$, then $S = T$. But if there is no point in proving the inductive hypothesis, then there is no point in proving the theorem. More generally, if $S \subseteq R^n$, then S is a subset of R^n .

You can prove this theorem by
